He took over his uncle Joseph Simpson's coal business, as much to help Joseph, as to give himself more of a chance of enjoying an outdoor life. His instinctive gifts with the welfare of animals, enabled him to send some of his best breeding stock to parts of Europe and also North America. Edward H. Milligan in British Quakers in Commerce and Industry, states that, Thomas eventually sold his last animal stock to his principal competitor, Lord Ellesmere. A closer scrutiny of the record, suggests that briefly, he was helped in 1864 by his cousin John Simpson (b.1823), son of Joseph, who had given up his farm at Whittington just over the border into Lancashire and presumably, was at a bit of a loose end, tried Coal merchanting in Halifax then moved to Brathay, near Ambleside.
